Recently there were some votes in favor of officially renaming BQS as 'Going Gold' in order to communicate this broader vision to the community. However I think there was a prevailing view that this was not needed as BQS had "never been [a] byword [for] either quality or quantity". That is an open and honest assessment of the situation in the last year or so. It is a fairly recent development. Over a year ago we had BQS Gold, which was very short lived, and then a relatively more successful Pro/Gold effort. Now BQS is 'Going Gold'. It is a change, and as change goes it has many implications. I see

This configuration presents a rectangle in profile view with the black stripes running parallel to the edge of the rectangle. The white stripes may be parallel to the edges, or oriented diagonally across the central black region. There are many variations on the theme of the zebra crossing. For example, a version of the zebra crossing may have more than two sets of stripes. Also, the same color for all four legs may be used, the legs may be of different colors, or the leg may be of a different color. In the U.S., traffic engineers consider the traditional zebra crossing at a right angle to be safe and suitable for all ages, shapes, and sizes of people, although there is some support for the idea that children could be injured by a crossing at an angle with less sight lines and more distraction. A study of accident data in New York City found that the risk of a pedestrian struck by a vehicle is about 12 times greater when crossing diagonally rather than at an angle. Other studies have indicated that pedestrian-vehicle collision rates increase as zebra crossings decrease in width. History The crossing at the junction of Leicester Square and Windmill Street, in the West End of London was introduced in 1796. It was designed by the architect Colen Campbell. The concept was spread throughout the United Kingdom by the 1820s. That was _actually_ (the legacy of) what I was looking for in the end. Personally I'm already using it, especially for all my educational activities at times where I'm using my (somewhat small) academic wikis - no more Tiddly f678ea9f9e
